GIANT LINER OFF TO COAST

Although she had over 1600 tons of freight to discharge at this port when she docked at sundown Friday night the big Pacific mail liner Manchuria had time to spare before she sailed for San Francisco yesterday noon. There was a big crowd at the Hackfeld dock to see her off but the piles of freight on the pier cut off the view of many and caused a congestion around the gangplank. Captain Berger was there with his band and the new march, "Steamer Day, Steamer Play" was rendered several times with great effect. The Manchuria is the thousandth steamer that the band has played off and the piece was written by Captain Berger especially in honor of the occasion. Its official name is the "Thousand and Steamers" march.

This is the second time the Manchuria has entered the harbor and she had no trouble leaving her dock or turning around in the harbor, though with her great length she almost spanned the bay from the Naval docks to the lighthouse. A good sized crowd departed from Honolulu and leis were in abundance. The steamer should be in San Francisco next Friday.

BETTER PAY THAN DROWN

"It pays a man to settle his bills with us boat boys," said John Mahuka as he sat on a box at the boat landing the other day whittling out a reel for his fish line. "Some time ago, maybe two years, there was an officer on a ship that called here who used our boats quite often. He generally got his boat from one of the old boat boys, who is dead now, and before the ship sailed he owed him two and a half or maybe three dollars. Every time he got through with a boat he would say, 'I haven't got any money today,' and the boat boy would say, 'Oh, that's all right; bimely you pay.' Well, the day before the ship sailed he said 'How much do I owe you?' The boat boy told him and he said, 'tomorrow, at half-past one, I will pay you.' 'The next day he went ashore and did not come back until just before the ship sailed. Then one of the other boat boys saw him sneaking around by a back street so as to avoid the boat landing. He went around by the Railroad Wharf and went aboard the ship and never paid the boat boy a cent. Just as the ship was being towed past the landing the boat boy he had cheated saw him leaning over the rail grinning, and he shook his fist at the ship and cried out, 'You said you would be back to pay me, but you won't ever come back. You have cheated me, and you'll go to h—l for it.' 'And what do you think?' said John, moving up and lowering his voice. 'He never did come back. That ship was the Florence and on her very next trip down she was lost with all on board. Pretty good kahuna, that boat boy, eh?'

And at any rate the story was powerful enough to cause several of the veteran boat boys' auditors to make rapid mental calculations to determine whether they owed for any boats or not.

Fullerton Almost Wrecked.

The Examiner of March 21 says: The Union Oil Company's barkentine Fullerton had a close call from going ashore on the rocks near Point Bonita last night. That she did not meet such a fate was due to a heavy hawser serving as an anchor until the crew had set sufficient canvas to help her away from danger. She was only a short distance from the rocks when the hawser was cut away and the wind sent the big vessel scurrying away from the roaring surf and into the harbor.

The Fullerton arrived off the harbor last night in tow of the steamer Argyle. For ten days the vessels had been on the voyage, and through the rough weather the steamer Argyle brought her tow in safety, but just as she was about to come into port a shackle of the chain which is part of the hawser gave way. The vessel was caught by the tide and slowly drifted shoreward. The entire crew was immediately put to work setting the sails, and when all was ready the order to cut away the hawser was given.

It seems strange that after towing the vessel all the way to the Hawaiian islands and back again to port without having any trouble with the hawser, it should part when almost at the end of the trip. The Fullerton will load another cargo of oil for the islands.

Mary E Foster Arrives.

The schooner Mary E. Foster, Captain Willer, arrived in port early yesterday morning, twenty-six days from Port Blakeley. She had a cargo of lumber. While attempting to dock she struck a mud bank but got off safely. She is now lying at Allen & Robinson's dock.
